

Survivor of Boston attack recalls locking eyes with bomber

BOSTON (AP) — A man who became one of the lasting images of the Boston Marathon bombing when he was wheeled away, ashen-faced, his legs severely injured, testified Thursday that he locked eyes with the bomber's older brother before the explosives went off.

"He was alone. He wasn't watching the race," said Jeff Bauman, who walked slowly into court on two prosthetic legs. "I looked at him, and he just kind of looked down at me. I just thought it was odd."

Bauman later described Tamerlan Tsarnaev to the FBI from his hospital bed. Tsarnaev, 26, died in a gun battle with police days after the bombing.

Bauman testified at the trial of Tsarnaev's younger brother, Dzhokhar, who could get the death penalty if convicted of charges he helped carry out the 2013 bombings that killed three people and wounded more than 260.

Before testimony began Thursday, Tsarnaev's lawyers complained to the judge that the survivors' testimony from the previous day was too gruesome and should be limited.

Defense attorney David Bruck objected specifically to the testimony of three women who described their injuries in detail and what they saw in the aftermath of the attack. Bruck said that under the federal death penalty law, victim-impact testimony is supposed to be presented during the second phase of the trial, when the jury decides on the punishment.

Prosecutors denied that any of the survivors gave victim-impact testimony and said they merely described what they saw.

U.S. District Judge George O'Toole Jr. agreed with prosecutors and refused to limit survivors' testimony.

The trial opened on Wednesday, with Tsarnaev attorney Judy Clarke bluntly admitting to the jury that her client took part in the attack. But in a bid to save Tsarnaev's life, she argued that he was influenced by his older brother.

The first witness to testify Thursday was a policeman who was the first officer to reach 29-year-old Krystle Campbell, one of those killed.

Officer Frank Chiola said he ran across the street to help the victims as soon as he heard the explosions. As he reached Campbell and began doing chest compressions, he said, smoke came out of her mouth. He said she appeared to be in a lot of pain.

Michael Brown's parents announce civil lawsuit in death

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Lawyers for the parents of an unarmed, black 18-year-old who was fatally shot by a white police officer in a St. Louis suburb have announced plans to file a civil lawsuit against the city of Ferguson and former Officer Darren Wilson.

Attorney Daryl Parks says the wrongful death suit will be filed soon, but didn't elaborate.

The comments at the news conference Thursday in north St. Louis County came in response to the findings of a Justice Department investigation that accused the Ferguson police department of unfairly targeting blacks but cleared Wilson in Michael Brown's death.

Brown's mother, Lesley McSpadden, and his father, Michael Brown Sr., attended the news conference at Greater St. Mark Missionary Baptist Church, but they didn't speak or take questions.

Oil company to pay $2M for illegal well in North Dakota

FARGO, N.D. (AP) — A Norway-based oil company accused of illegally operating a well in North Dakota that was planned by its predecessor has agreed to pay nearly $2 million to settle a civil suit.

Authorities say the well was drilled in December 2011 on unleased federal land about two weeks after Statoil Oil & Gas Services Inc. acquired Brigham Oil & Gas L.P.

An investigation that began two years later discovered that Statoil had produced and sold federally owned oil and natural gas valued at nearly $2 million.

U.S. Attorney Timothy Purdon says Statoil's cooperation in the investigation showed "good corporate citizenship."

A Statoil spokeswoman could not be immediately reached for comment.

Failures by three governments preceded homeless man's death

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Mistakes and miscommunication by three governments on three continents over nearly 20 years led to a homeless man known as "Africa" being on Los Angeles' Skid Row, where he was shot by police after authorities say he became combative and appeared to reach for an officer's weapon.

The problems began in the late 1990s when French officials gave him a passport under what turned out to be a stolen name. He came to the U.S., robbed a bank and then was convicted and imprisoned under the same false name.

U.S. immigration officials wanted to send him back to his native Cameroon but that country never responded to requests to take him. So he was released from a halfway house last May, and U.S. probation officials lost track of him in November.

It took three failed monthly check-ins for a warrant to be issued on a probation violation and it's unclear whether anyone actually looked for him. He apparently was living the entire time on Skid Row, roughly 50 square blocks of liquor stores, warehouses, charitable missions and a few modest businesses.

Many of the estimated 1,700 people who sleep each night on the sidewalks are mentally ill, like Africa.

Los Angeles police Cmdr. Andrew Smith said the man had no previous arrests in Los Angeles. While officers spoke to him once or twice, he gave them no reason to suspect he was wanted.

"If you're cool and you're quiet, and you don't make a big fuss, you can sit out there quietly and live in your tent pretty much in peace," said Smith. "If the feds put out a warrant for this guy, shoot, there's no reason we'd suspect he's in Skid Row."

The true name of the man who was long known to authorities as Charley Saturin Robinet remained a mystery Wednesday, three days after a violent death that was captured on a bystander's video and watched by millions.

Authorities said the man tried to grab a rookie Los Angeles police officer's gun, prompting three other officers to shoot. Chief Charlie Beck said the officers had arrived to investigate a robbery report and the man refused to obey their commands and became combative.

Peter Nunez, a former U.S. attorney in San Diego who is chairman of the Center for Immigration Studies in Washington, D.C., said the case points to multiple failures by government.

He criticized France for not being more diligent in investigating the man's background before issuing a passport and U.S. authorities for not realizing he was a "fraud" before the end of his prison term and then not putting more effort into finding him once he disappeared.

"Shame on all of them," said Nunez, whose group advocates for stricter immigration policies and enforcement.

Axel Cruau, France's consul general in Los Angeles, said the system for checking backgrounds was vastly different when the man duped French officials.

"Let's remember 20 years ago we didn't have the same databases we have today, the same rules, we didn't have biometric design, it was before 9/11," he said.

Using the false name, the man was believed to be a French citizen in 2000 when convicted of robbing a Wells Fargo branch in Los Angeles and pistol-whipping an employee in what he told authorities was an effort to pay for acting classes at the Beverly Hills Playhouse.

In 2013, as he was nearing his release from a federal prison in Rochester, Minnesota, French officials found the real Robinet in France, Cruau said. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement then determined the impostor actually was from Cameroon but said the African country ignored repeated requests for travel documents, hampering efforts to deport him.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 2001 that immigration authorities cannot detain people indefinitely just because no country will take them. Justice Stephen Breyer wrote that the government would need a special reason to keep someone in custody after six months if deportation seemed unlikely in "the reasonably foreseeable future."

"ICE makes every possible effort to remove all individuals with final orders of removal within a reasonable period," spokeswoman Virginia Kice said. "If the actual removal cannot occur within the reasonably foreseeable future, ICE must release the individual."

A person who said he only has one name, Bindz, and heads the consular section at the Cameroon Embassy in Washington said he couldn't respond to questions by phone and the ambassador would have to answer in writing.

The man was in immigration custody in September

2013 when a federal judge in California ordered him to a halfway house in Los Angeles. He was released from the halfway house in May, said Ed Ross, a spokesman for the Bureau of Prisons. His sentence included three years of supervision by federal probation officials.

The man had no place to stay and eventually found his way to Skid Row. He was required to provide reports to his probation officer each month and did so for a time, Deputy U.S. Marshal Matthew Cordova said. But he failed to make contact in November, December and January, and a warrant was issued Jan. 9.

Karen Redmond, a spokeswoman for the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, which represents U.S. Probation and Pretrial Services System, declined to comment on what attempts were made to find him, citing an open investigation.

Also Wednesday, police said none of the four officers involved, whose experience ranged from rookie to 11-year department veteran, had fired their weapons while on duty before.

The officers' names were being withheld until it was determined there was no credible threat to their safety, Smith said.

Annie's Mailbox

Dear Annie: My husband and I are recently retired teachers who have been able to travel extensively because we budgeted well. I have motion sickness and other health issues that make traveling unpleasant. I want to do less of it, but my husband wants to do more.

My passion for retirement was always to volunteer. Several retired teachers set up a store filled with donations where our students can shop for free. I help out three afternoons a week. Many of the retired teachers have mobility issues and rely on me to carry donated items. When I travel, the others take turns doing the heavy work, but I know it is a struggle for them.

My husband's idea of retirement is to spend at least three months as "snowbirds" in Florida. This doesn't appeal to me at all, but as a compromise, I reluctantly agreed to spend one month each year in Florida.

The first year was tolerable, but after a week, I was bored and missed my volunteer work. I told my husband he was free to stay, but I would return when my month was up. I've looked into volunteer opportunities in Florida, but everything is at least 30 minutes away, and we only have one car, which my husband uses to go golfing.

I have kept my part of the agreement and am getting annoyed at the pressure from my husband to spend more time in Florida. He knows he can invite other relatives or friends to join him. I realize these are "high-class worries," but do you have any suggestions for resolving this before we start up again next year? —

M.W.
Dear M.W.: Your husband wants you with him, which is why he keeps pressuring you. Would you consider going for a month in the middle of those months so your husband would feel less alone? How about investing in a second car so you can do volunteer work in Florida, or perhaps finding a place to play golf that is within walking distance? There are ways to compromise a bit more if you truly wish to make the effort, but meanwhile, tell your husband we said to knock off the full-court press.

Dear Annie: Please allow me to use your column to say thank you to someone. I was in a restaurant in The Villages in Florida waiting for my check when the manager came over and said my dinner was already taken care of. Apparently, a woman paid my bill, saying she was paying forward a kindness that someone else had once done for her.

I would like to thank her publicly and assure her that I will be paying it forward as she did for me. — B.
Dear B.: We are always happy to hear of such kindnesses. We have many fans in The Villages, and we hope whoever bought your dinner will see this and know that it was appreciated, and that you will be doing the same for someone else. Thanks for letting us know.
Dear Annie: I disagree with your advice to "Trying To Build a Better Life in the Midwest" to seek ways to accommodate her husband's sexual desires.

My wife decided in her early 50s that she was tired of sex. I decided that respecting her wishes superseded all "desires of the flesh." A woman has the right to say "no," and any man who has been married for 35 years should have the wisdom to turn his attention to matters other than his sexual appetite.

For me, that meant accepting my wife's requests in order to avoid harassing her. My wife is a beautiful woman and the mother of our adult children. Her attention to the family's needs and her detail in maintaining a beautiful home are examples of why sex is no longer a priority in my life. — Respect for the Woman I Love
Dear Annie: My husband and I have been married for 10 years, but I sometimes wonder whether I love him or am just used to having him around. We have no kids, and I've started thinking of how my life would be without him.

This all began when he first displayed an awful temper. He never gets physically violent, but he hurts me tremendously with the things he says. He pays some of my bills, but always puts his wants and needs before household things that are more important, like fixing the car or filling my prescriptions. I have to walk on eggshells most of the time. When it's a holiday or Valentine's Day, he expects me to get him something, but he never does anything special for me.

My friends think I'm still with him because I'm afraid to be alone. There are times when I enjoy his company, but not that often. I'm not even sexually attracted to him anymore. Should I continue on because it just might be a phase I'm going through? — Tired of It
Dear Tired: While all relationships go through ups and downs, yours includes verbal abuse and what appears to be a total lack of consideration. This is not acceptable behavior between loving spouses. If your husband is willing to go with you for counseling and work on this, there is hope for the relationship. If not (and we suspect not), please talk to a counselor on your own and try to clarify your feelings enough to make decisions about your future. There are worse things than being alone.

Dear Annie: I have a friend who dominates every conversation. Upon sitting down to eat, she immediately starts talking about whatever is on her mind and never pauses to let anyone else get a word in. She never asks how anyone else is doing. If not interrupted, she can go on for hours.

Ironically, she complains about how her sister talks on and on about herself. She can see these traits in her siblings, but doesn't realize she is just as bad. Some days, I feel more like her unpaid therapist than a friend. Evenings out have become unpleasant to the point that we don't socialize much anymore.

I have two other friends who behave in a similar manner. I notice that all three come from very large families, so I wonder whether that contributes to their need for attention. Still, we are in our 50s, and they should be more socially mature by now.

Don't suggest confronting these people. They would be so offended, I would lose their friendship forever. I am not looking to change the relationships. I am writing because I wish each person reading this would ask themselves, "Could this be me?" When you sit down with people, ask how their day was. Listen intently until they are done. Don't interrupt with something you "just have to" tell them. Maybe their conversation isn't fascinating, but neither is yours. Everyone should be allowed to share and be heard. — Bored in the USA

Dear Bored: Amen. Some folks ramble on and on because they need to be the center of attention. Others have hearing problems and cannot clearly make out the conversation of others. Some fear they will forget what they intended to say if they don't blurt it out immediately. We hope they appreciate your tolerance.

Dear Annie: I read the letter from "A Kansas Caregiver," who asked people to lend a hand to the caregivers. I cared for my husband who had dementia for seven years before he died. My lifesaver during that time was my caregiver support group.

Since then, I have facilitated a caregiver group, and we meet monthly to share happy and poignant stories, medical progress, information about resources, etc. Mostly, meetings are a safe place filled with understanding, nonjudgmental people who are all on the same journey. — Baton Rouge, La.
