McConnells continue the family business

DAWN FOSSAND
WESTERN NEBRASKA OBSERVER

After taking over the family business, started in the 1950s by Royce McConnell's grandfather, young ranching couple Royce and Lisa McConnell and their extended family remain focused on producing Angus cattle.

Additionally, the owners and operators of McConnell Angus of Dix focus on raising their families, growing feed, and holding cattle sales.

"We've been involved in the cattle industry all of our lives," said Royce. "So that's somewhere over 60 years of combined experience."

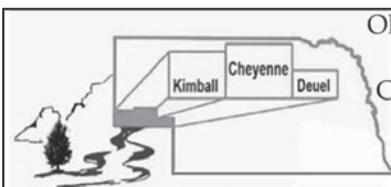

They raise herd sires and breeding stock, running approximately 400 to 425 fall calving cows annually on their ranch.

“The most enjoyable part of the business is seeing our cattle work for our customers by helping them to be successful as well,” Royce said.

The only complaint the couple touted was at times fighting the elements of weather.

The McConnells have been married for 12 years and have four children who are very involved in the family ranching business in nearly every aspect.

“They’re involved in most aspects of the job, from getting the tags ready for the baby calves right down to recording the radio advertisement for our bull sale. They love the ranch lifestyle as much as we do,” Lisa said. “They are absolutely involved.”

The McConnells held a fall female sale in December of 2014, and sold more than 350 head, including 270 bred heifers, calving Feb. 1 through April 1; and registered and commercial black Angus and black baldies.

The passion they have for the business can be seen in the success of their family, their ranch and their sales.

“We raise cattle because we have a passion for producing seed stock for today’s cattlemen in today’s environment,” Royce said. “We also raise our own feed for the cattle, in the way of hay, alfalfa and corn silage.”

Poss family raises a different kind of cow

TONIA COPELAND

WESTERN NEBRASKA OBSERVER

There is something different about those cows. One western Nebraska family breeds, raises and shows a heritage breed of cattle named for the rugged and remote area in which it has flourished for centuries, the Scottish Highlands, and there is something different about them.

Heather and Gordon Poss, along with their children - Mitchell, Jonathan and Emily - raise this breed not just because it reflects their own Scottish heritage, but also because this breed's hearty nature makes it well-suited to the climate of western Nebraska, just as it is perfect for the rugged terrain and unpredictable weather of the Scottish Highlands.

Though the Poss family, owners of Bennachie Farms, currently raise 200 to 250 head of cattle, a number which has gone as high as 350, the family patriarch said they are primarily farmers, not ranchers.

This breed of cattle is often misunderstood and unfairly feared, Heather said, due to the horns that every adult grows. However, that is not the only trait that sets this breed apart from others.

This Scottish Highland breed calf rests in the field.

They also grow long hair which keeps them warm in cold climates, yet they are comfortable in the summer heat due to their low fat content. Because they grow at a slower rate and spend less energy producing a warming layer of fat, Scottish Highland cattle produce lean meat, often sought after by high-end restaurants.

“Right now we sell to a rancher in Colorado, they are finishing them out on grass and selling to the high-end restaurants by Aspen,” Gordon said.

Heather added that in the eastern United States, one hospital signed a contract for the lean Highland beef to serve in their cardiac ward.

The Poss family also finishes some of their cattle on their pastures for themselves and to sell.

“Do you know what's in your meat? We do because we grow what they eat,” Heather said. “That's our biggest motto.”

The Highland cattle's slower rate of weight gain makes the breed less popular among commercial producers, as an Angus can be finished out in 12 months while a Highland may take 15.

However, she said that these docile animals offer many characteristics not often seen in cattle, including the highest maternal instincts and a sense of community when calves are born.

“One thing they are known for is their mothering ability, so we rarely have to pull calves,” Emily said. “They will also be protective if you get near their calves, but for the most we find they are a little bit more docile than any other cows. They also seem to have a designated babysitter which is usually one of the older cows. So all the others will be out in the pasture and there will be babies with this one cow and you can just tell she is babysitting while the moms eat.”

“They have personality, they are not just cattle, they actually do have personality, I can't explain it,” Heather said. “We don't treat them like pets, they are cattle and they are beef cattle primarily.”

Emily added that many owners have small herds of 10 that are a hobby and are looked at as pets. While their family recognizes the cattle's unique traits, and chose them for those traits, they maintain them as cattle, not pets.

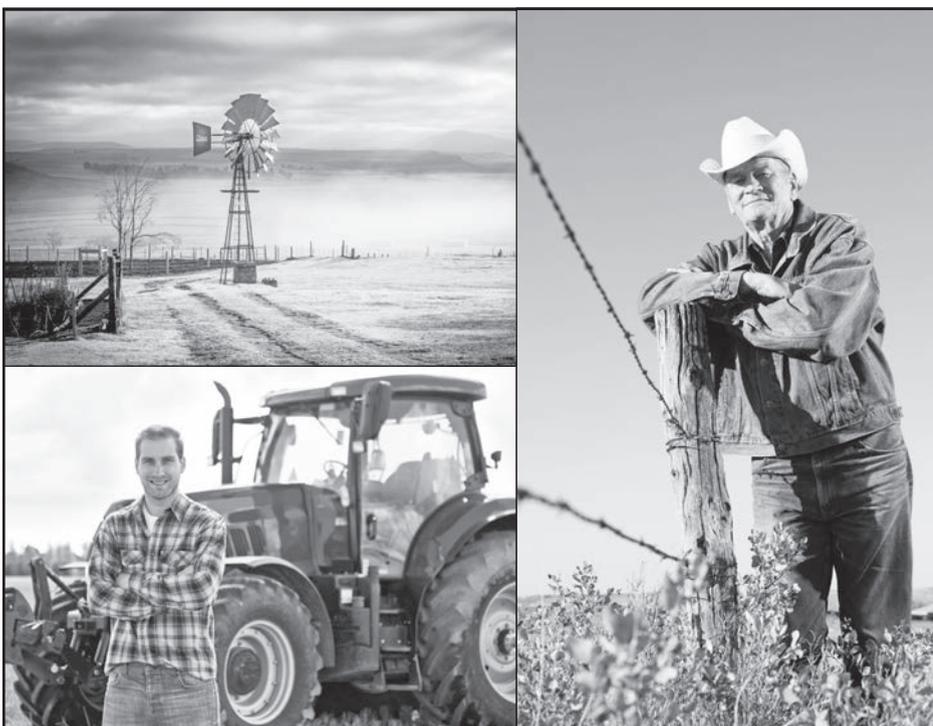

“With kids, their docile nature is one of the reasons we picked this particular breed,” Gordon said. “We didn't want anybody to get hurt.”

The children were able to show the cattle through 4-H at the early age of 8, and then graduated to showing with FFA as well as the National Western Stock Show in Denver. The stock show is similar to an FFA or 4-H show on a larger scale, according to the Poss's, with participants from around the world.

Emily said that showing the young beasts was not intimidating, as she grew up knowing how to respect them and worked often with the show stock.

“They would show animals they had known since babyhood,” her mother added. “When we show, it is very hands-on. The animal needs to know them.”

The family previously participated in the National Western Stock Show annually, but as the children became active in sports, the family had a decision to make. Ultimately, they stopped showing to accommodate their game and practice schedules.

“We sat down as a family and said, ‘Which way do you want to go?’ and the kids said they wanted to do sports,” Heather said. “So we quit showing. We started showing again last year.”

Their first year back following a 9-year hiatus, they showed a grand champion and all of their animals earned ribbons.

Many of the Scottish Highland showmen come from the eastern United States. This particular stock show is a big deal for the Poss family as it is the largest national show for the American Highland Cattle Association.

While in Denver, the family competes against other Highland breeds, though they do not raise the breed specifically to show, as some do. More importantly, the stock show offers them family time, as well as a time to connect with friends from across the nation with their same passion for Scottish Highland cattle.

“My best friend in the industry is from Michigan, so I get to see her,” Heather said. “We catch up with people from New York that we don’t get to see except for in Denver.”

The family says that other Scottish Highland showmen have become like an extended family, and the stock show is their social gathering.

“The people who do it, do it for the love and passion of the breed,” Emily said. “I love educating people at the stock show as to why Highlands are not that different and not that scary.”

Carruthers began cattle company in 2009

DAWN FOSSAND
WESTERN NEBRASKA OBSERVER

Troy and Brandi Carruthers started Carruthers Cattle Company together in 2009. Troy grew up helping and working on his parents' family farm, until he went off to college.

"After college I began a career as a financial planner with intentions to return to ranching at some point," Troy said. "And my parents' endeavors had changed, so it was wonderful to have met a girl (his wife, Brandi) who shared my goals as was equally excited to jump in with both feet to purchase our place together."

Troy added that he continues to assist clients with their financial planning in addition to working on the ranch. He said that the teamwork with Brandi is "essential" in accomplishing this work.

The Carruthers have 100 head of commercial black Angus mother cows, which are bred to Hereford bulls by means of artificial insemination - or A.I. They then follow that up with putting the Angus cattle with Hereford herd bulls to ensure pregnancies.

"We are creating F1 Black Baldies, where we sell the steer calves at weaning time and purchase back an equivalent group of Baldies heifer calves that will be grown to maturity with our home raised heifers," he said. "As yearlings they will then be A.I.-bred to a proven calving ease Black Angus bull and sold as bred heifers."

Carruthers stated they are purely a ranching operation, and do not farm their own feed for the cattle.

The daily tasks or chores that occur on the ranch will vary greatly with each season, according to the rancher.

“As mentioned before, our teamwork is essential, but truly loving all we do doesn't hurt,” said Troy. “We love cattle, we love talking cattle, we love working cattle, we love the people in the business and the family time it allows for. How is it said? If you love what you do, it's not work? We feel so blessed that God has provided us with these opportunities and way of life.”

The Carruthers' mother cows calve starting in the beginning of May through June, where they must check, feed, tag and record keep on the cattle – and both man and wife share these responsibilities.

“This is one of our girls' favorite times of year,” said Troy. “They love to spot cows in labor or new calves and they love telling all what this ranch life entails.”

Carruthers explains that their daughters have a few cows of their own that will help pay for college some day, and said that either one or both of their girls are there involved in the daily chores of the ranch.

“Even at the young ages of 3 and 5, our children have real life experience of life, death, business and understand that there are times taking care of all these critters comes before all else,” said Troy. “It has been a wonderful opportunity to teach them about the sovereign nature of our great God through it all. They love getting dirty and being outside. Nothing can compete with the values they'll learn through selflessness, responsibility and hard work in what God has given us.”

The rancher explained that because their calving time is between May and June, that it has allowed them to custom calve heifers from January through April.

“These cattle have come from clients we have bred heifers for the previous year. One our favorite parts of our business is our A.I. arm services and seaman sales. Brandi and I work with Genex. Both of us are certified A.I. Technicians, and together in our 2015 season bred 2,000-plus head of cows and heifers.

“A.I. season goes from April to July for spring calves and October to December for fall calves. In winter months there are feed and water chores as well as temporary fence for winter grazing. Summer months fence maintenance and water. In each season herd management including branding, vaccinating and seeing to it that overall herd health and nutrition requirements are met.”

Troy added that both he and his wife have responsibilities outside of the ranch work. He

Cheyenne Co. Farm Bureau receives national honor

Award handed out at Florida conference

RYAN HERMENS
THE SIDNEY SUN-TELEGRAPH

The Cheyenne County Farm Bureau received national recognition at a January American Farm Bureau Federation conference.

Tyson Narjes, president of the local organization, said the County Activities of Excellence honor was awarded to the Cheyenne County Farm Bureau because of its work seeking local beef donations for the Sidney Public School District.

The CAE award program showcases the top county Farm Bureau activities throughout the county.

“These county Farm Bureaus and their award-winning activities serve as models of innovation for local program development and display the amazing ability of local Farm Bureau volunteers working together to strengthen the lives of rural Americans and build strong, prosperous agricultural communities,” according to the national federation.

Narjes attended the annual conference in Orlando, Fla., earlier this month to accept the award and explain the program to others.

“We talked with other members from around the country on the program and how they might be able to start one,” Narjes said.

The Raider Beef program started earlier this year and is based on a similar undertaking in Morrill County, he explained. There are about 10 programs throughout the state that also work to get local beef into schools.

Narjes said the Raider Beef program was initiated after the Sidney school district approached the Farm Bureau. At the time, Narjes said, the Farm Bureau was already looking in to creating a similar relationship between producers and the school.

PROVIDED PHOTO

Tyson Narjes, president of the Cheyenne County Farm Bureau, accepted a County Activities of Excellence award at the annual American Farm Bureau Federation conference in Orlando, Fla., earlier this month.

Through partnerships, the program seeks donations from in the form of cattle or funds to purchase cattle and gives the school district the beef.

The beef is processed at an approved facility into hamburger and given to school. The only cost to the district is the transportation of the animals to the processing facility.

“This is our first year,” Narjes said. “Now that we’re getting some traction, it’s taken off and we’re getting a lot more interest in what we’re doing.”

The ultimate goal is to invest the money the school district saves into creating an agriculture education program, he added.

Sidney doesn’t offer a Future Farmers of America program and Narjes wants to change that.

Born and raised in Cheyenne County, Narjes now runs a farm of his own.

“Growing up, I had a lot of classmates interested in agriculture and thought it was important to get more education than just 4-H,” he said.

While attending college in Lincoln, many of his peers had been able to avail of FFA offerings.

Narjes wants to ensure students in Sidney can have the added support and education an FFA program can provide.

“Growing up and seeing demographics change over the years, and seeing that agriculture has kind of been pushed back and forgotten about, our goal is to bring awareness of what happens outside of the city limits,” he said.

Iowa native began cattle company in Pine Bluffs

DAWN FOSSAND

WESTERN NEBRASKA OBSERVER

Dave Duello, owner of the Duello Cattle Company, was raised on a ranch alongside an average of 75 cattle in eastern Iowa where his family grew corn and soybeans.

After graduating high school in Iowa, Duello attended Iowa State University where he received his bachelors degree in animal science and a masters degree and doctorate in beef/cattle population genetics.

Duello is a member of the 1986 national champion livestock judging team and won several livestock judging awards, including the second high individual award at the North American Livestock Expo in Louisville, Ky.

While working on his higher education, he also worked as a livestock coaching instructor at the university. Duello coached the 1992 and 1998 national champion teams.

"I have been fortunate to have judged about every big livestock cattle show, at one time or another, at the national and state level. It would take a page and a half to list them all," Duello said. "I have also been to New Zealand and Australia in the late 1990s. At that time, (cattle) was a grass fed product. They do have some feedlots in those countries who now offer grains to their cattle."

In the early 1990s, Duello became an operations manager for one of the largest Angus operations in the nation at that time, Ankony Angus.

For the past nine years, Duello has owned and operated his own livestock company in Wyoming, where he staffs two full-time employees.

He breeds approximately 400 composite bred cows annually and calves approximately 300 composite cows each spring.

Currently in the company's seventh year of sales, Duello said that half of its gross sales come annually at the Western Stock Show in Denver.

"The sale is unique and extremely successful every year," he said. "We raise a pretty lean product from a standpoint of the high end breeding cow that we sell. We sell cows for embryo transplant work and a lot of people will raise show cattle of those different breeds. We get a cow to super-ovulate and take those embryos out of the superior cows and let the less superior cows raise those calves.

"We get 50 to 75 calves out of our top 10 cows every year – out of the 300 that we calve each year. We mass produce the superior cattle."

Duello said he enjoys being involved with the local 4-H and FFA youth with livestock judging, and although he stays extremely busy on a day to day basis, he loves every minute of it. He offers anyone who is interested to come to the ranch in Pine Bluffs to, "stop and look...and just say 'hello'."

Colorado Cattle Company allows visitors to experience the cowboy life

DAWN FOSSAND

WESTERN NEBRASKA OBSERVER

The Colorado Cattle Company, south of Kimball in Colorado, is a dream come true for those wishing to experience the cowboy life.

According to owners Tom and Darcy Carr, the history of this ranch began in the mid 1800s when a man named John Iliff ran cattle all over the area, including through the area which is now the Colorado Cattle Company.

Iliff had cattle from the Colorado mountains to Kansas, and from Wyoming to the South Platte River. In 1868 he set up a base camp just southwest of the Carr's ranch – then changed the direction of the cattle drives heading north.

The drives came through his camp for fresh horses and decent food. Iliff then set up a line camp close to the ranch, where he took care of thousands of head of cattle.

Many flocked to the area to claim a 160-acre homestead through the Homestead Act of 1862 and the once-wild frontier became populated with homesteads, two towns, a store and a school.

According to the Carrs, Iliff was unhappy with the new population, and began fencing the public lands to keep it for his grazing cattle.

He also attempted to homestead all the land around every known water source by having his employees homestead it, and he then purchased it from them.

When the government realized what was happening, they passed a law to force the cattle barons to take down fencing around public lands and un-owned water sources. The saga ended when Iliff went broke, as many ranchers did, in the winter of 1886-87 when cattle froze or starved to death.

At that time the 10,000 acre ranch became covered with crop farmers homesteading the land. Leonard Biggs was one of those farmers.

Biggs built a sod house with logs purchased off a train in Kimball in the 1880s. The sod house still stands, and is being used as a mechanical room at this time.

Eventually, other homesteaders left, but Biggs stayed and added cattle to his operation.

He also began the Carr's guest business by catering to passersby on the stagecoaches. Biggs provided a place for guests to stay, eat and even trade horses.

The original Biggs' bunkhouse is still in use today for guests of the Colorado Cattle Company, which the Carrs purchased in 2009.

"We were booking for our fourth year at the ranch, and found out the previous owners wanted to sell the ranch and were not taking reservations," Tom said. "So, I asked if they had a buyer and she told me no. That was on Sunday, Feb. 15, 2009. We met the following Wednesday for lunch in Denver and made a deal. We moved in on April 9, 2009."

The ranch family has grown to now include the Carr's daughter, Jackie, and son-in-law, Scott.

"I am hoping that we can pass down the ranch to Jackie and her family, and eventually it will be Addie's (the Carr's 15-month-old granddaughter). I would like to keep it in the family," Tom said.

Currently home to 85 horses, the Colorado Cattle Company keeps younger, working horses busy in the guest ring and the wranglers work with them weekly to keep them tame and trained.

Horses that are older and no longer able to work are kept in a special section at the ranch with a large area for walking and shelter. They are given special grains and medicines and they will continue to live on the ranch and be taken care of until their passing. The horse will then be placed in a special cemetery with name markers created by the family, complete with a beautiful bronze statue.

"The animals are treated like family here," Jackie said. "They are here until the end. They are treated with respect.

All of our animals are."

The ranch hosts visitors from all over the world. The ranch is home to 39 head of "play cattle" for guests to practice roping and team pinning.

In addition to the guest ranch herd, the family day herds approximately 400 pair, which are not used at the guest ranch, for other ranchers.

Day herding includes a five-year contract for the daily care of cattle, including feed, vaccinations, branding and castration, so guests can experience some of the care that goes into raising cattle — just another aspect of the cowboy life.

"The guests do not have to do any of these activities unless they want to, but we will let them experience what they want," Darcy said, though branding only happens annually in May.

The family and their staff work on keeping the livestock healthy, as well as maintenance, upkeep and some painting during the winter months.

They average around 16 guests a week and prefer not to go over a 20-person group. However, according to Jackie, there was an exception made for a very special group.

"The group of 30 persons that we booked for this coming October, are spouses of fallen soldiers," Tom said. "It's really pretty neat. They'll get everyone together for riding and to get away and they do grief counseling at the same time."

A large world map hangs just inside their doors, speckled with different colored push pins to mark where guests visit from. Currently 34 national flags are displayed inside the indoor riding arena representing guests home countries as well.

"Last year, 68 percent of our clients came from somewhere besides the United States," the Carrs said. "England is our number one. We also have people from Italy, Ireland, Saudi Arabia, Germany and other places."

Tom's favorite part of owning and running the Colorado Cattle Company is "seeing the fulfillment of a dream," he said.

"We are all about, 'This week you are a cowboy,'" Tom said.

Being a cowboy isn't the only dream fulfilled at the ranch.

Because she loves the animals, the ranch also fulfills Darcy's dream.

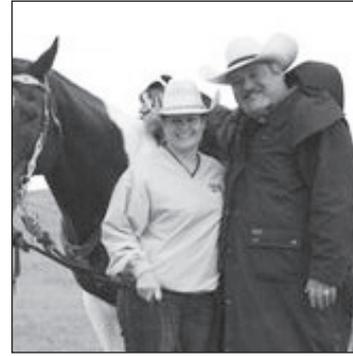

"I'm an animal nut, so this is my dream come true," she said.

As one of two known working cattle ranches that double as a vacationing ranch, the Colorado

Cattle Company stands apart by catering only to adults.

The Carrs, members of the National Dude Rancher's Association, provide a true escape for their guests.

"We are a jewel in the plains here," Tom said.

Schnell continues long line of family in agriculture

DAWN FOSSAND

WESTERN NEBRASKA OBSERVER

Klent Schnell, a third generation cattle producer, has many things to be proud of. One of those things is producing the best food and fiber on earth.

Raised on the family cattle ranch west of Kimball, Schnell has always been exposed to the calf/cow and farming operation.

“After (college) graduation, I returned to the ranch,” he said. “My dad (Dave) and I bought out my uncle and grandpa, who no longer wanted to be involved in the operation.”

He now spends each day feeding, calving, processing, sorting and checking water on the WJD Ranch and the Par Terre Ranch.

WJD encompasses the farm and ranch ground, in addition to the farming operation, while Par Terre is mainly the cattle side of the Schnell family operation.

Par Terre began 13 years ago when the family began holding an annual bull sale. Par Terre annually markets 30 to 35 Simm Angus and Maine Angus breeding age bulls and 20 to 25 show steers and heifers.

“Our bull customers are very good commercial cattlemen in the tri-state area,” he said. “We have marketed cattle in Nebraska, Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, South Dakota, North Dakota and Iowa. Every female on the ranch is artificially bred every spring and then turned out with our herd bulls to finish off the breeding season. I also custom A.I. (artificially inseminate) many ranches' cattle in the area every spring.”

Within the operation, the men run approximately 350 cows that calve in January and February each year and 80 that calve in August and September.

According to Schnell, they market 30 to 35 bulls each year on their sale and also sell 20 to 25 steers and heifers to area 4-H and FFA youth. The rest of the steers and heifers are fed in the family farming feedlot and are marketed throughout the fall and winter months.

He said most of their bull customers are located in Nebraska and Wyoming, but many of their feeder cattle have been marketed in Nebraska, Iowa, Colorado and Kansas.

“We also have a fellow breeder located in Canada that we have purchased a couple of herd bulls from. We also market semen and embryos into many of these states as well,” he said.

Of all of the duties this cattle producer has, calving requires the most hands-on experience and the largest time commitment with the cattle.

“We hire some help when it comes to branding and weaning time,” he said. “There are some days that extra help would be nice, but we manage to get everything done on time with the two of us.”

He added that what he enjoys about the lifestyle is spending time outdoors and not having a set eight hour day, but there is so much more to be proud of.

“So many people today do not realize where their food comes from,” Schnell said. “We, as American farmers/ranchers, produce the best food and fiber on this earth. If we don't, many in this world will be dependent on foreign countries to produce their food.”

One of the most rewarding aspects of selling cattle for Schnell is seeing Par Terre breeding in his customers' own herds and having repeat buyers year after year at the bull sale.

“Also, seeing a steer that you sold to a local

4-H or FFA member end up in the final drive at a local county fair is always rewarding," he said. "4-H and FFA are the best programs for youth to stay connected to agriculture."

Schnell feels fortunate to have been involved in the county/regional 4-H programs from age 8 to 18, and said he enjoyed it while he was growing up. And for as long as he can remember, he has always wanted to be involved in the family ranching and farming operation.

When asked what advice he would offer to youth interested in ranching and farming, Schnell said, "First, I was very fortunate to have the opportunity to come back and join my family on the family ranch. It would be very difficult to start a ranching/farming operation today without the opportunity to join a family operation. If one is thinking about becoming involved in farming and ranching, I would try to start working for someone that is thinking about slowing down and maybe retiring in the near future and talk with them about maybe continuing their operation. Also, I would remind them that there are no set hours and some long days, but it is a very rewarding career. There are days that end up going in a different direction than you thought, but that is part of what makes this career so fun."

Schnell said that he and his wife are happy that they have the opportunity to raise their daughters and son around livestock and to be able to teach them the value of hard work ethics, that they wouldn't get by living in town.

He would like to see their children, Kaitlynn, Kale and Kennedy, develop an interest in taking over the ranch someday, but he has not thought too far into the future yet.

"That is why we are firm believers in the 4-H and FFA programs," he said. "I am still very involved with both programs and believe we need to get more youth involved in seeing where their food and fiber come from."

Schnell said that he is very fortunate to have a wife and a mother who are both very supportive of their busy and time-consuming operations. While his wife, Sara, teaches elementary school in Pine Bluffs, Wyo., and his mother, Bev, is the administrator of the Kimball County Manor, they both help when needed.

"They both help out when tractors need moved to different fields, cooking branding meals, and setting up the meal and clerking the bull sale," Schnell said. "They both also helped out tremendously when we were showing cattle at the Black Hills Stock Show in Rapid City and at the National Western in Denver."

Schnell has much to be proud of: his family, their ranch and the life they have chosen.
